"I traveled to Hazard, Kentucky in search of giant earthmoving machines.
Operations inside the local coal mines are among the most efficient in the world.
Huge explosions decimate the mountainous perimeter, blasting immense clouds of flyrock into a colossal open pit. State-of-the-art technology guides the world's largest trucks and bulldozers--their cockpits bristling with instruments-- as they race through the shifting labyrinths of rubble, ramps and roadways.
Detonations occur twice daily, peeling back layers of deep bedrock, providing ready access to tiny veins of low grade coal."
